This map plots the oldest datable solar eclipse on November 30, 2298 BC. Sargon, the Conquering Hero: "Sargon had barely ventured into the land of Utara-pashtim (read Utanapishtim = Noah), when as if he were hostile, the forest waged war against him. It [he] set darkness in place of the light of the heavens. The sun dimmed, the stars sallied forth against the enemy...." See this chronology 2298 BC. The eclipse track is the red line, and the yellow lines show the northern and southern limits of the moon's shadow. Military activity at this early date was a matter of raids on other cities. Sargon's army probably never numbered more than about 5,000 men, and his conquests of Mari and Sumer were late in his reign. The large area of Urartu represents mostly a pastoral and farming settlement, and I am fairly sure that Sargon's expedition against it was a raid, and not warfare as prosecuted in later ages. The legendary epics tended to exaggerate matters and exploits. The reality is that Sargon suffered a spiritual defeat when he went to the land of Noah, and the eclipse is just an excuse, at setback conveniently blamed on the gods. In these days, it was fairly easy for raiders to bypass strongpoints that were not the objective of their raid.
